Abstract

Francis T. King (1819-1891), was a Quaker, a philanthropist and respectable businessman, and mercantile. The Baltimore Association to Advise and Assist Friends in the Southern States (1865-1885) helped rebuild North Carolina This dissertation examines King's life and shows how Francis King and The Association's primary goal was to rebuild the education system within North Carolina for Quakers, also rebuilding New Garden Boarding School (1837-1888), which became Guilford College in 1888. In addition, King and The Association rebuilt an agricultural system in North Carolina, which caught on throughout the Southern States. The dissertation outlines how the Association facilitated the creation of Normal Schools, during the American Reconstruction period (1865-1877, post-American Civil War) at a time when the social structures changed in North Carolina and the Southern States with blacks being released from slavery and attempting to secure equality with the white public. The broader white non-Quaker society also established two separate societies and school systems, one for blacks and one for white. Also, the system of agriculture went from slave labor to a new system of slavery known as sharecropping, which exploited both blacks and whites. The dissertation argues that King's work is undervalued and under-represented in previous scholarship.

Francis's comment does nothing to alter Catholic doctrine, but it nonetheless represents a remarkable shift for a church that has fought against LGBT legal rights — with past popes calling same-sex unions inadmissible and deviant. Francis's statement is also notable within a papacy that on the whole hasn't been as revolutionary as progressives had hoped and conservatives had feared. AD. He has long expressed an interest in outreach to the church's LGBT followers, but his previous remarks as pope have stressed understanding and welcoming rather than substantive policies. Samuel Todd Francis (April 29, 1947 – February 15, 2005), known as Sam Francis, was an American white nationalist, writer and syndicated columnist in the United States. He was a columnist and editor for the conservative Washington Times until he was fired after making racist remarks at the 1995 conference of the group American Renaissance.[1] Francis would later become a "dominant force" on the Council of Conservative Citizens,[2] an anti-black, anti-immigrant group that espoused racism.[3] Francis was chief editor of the Council's newsletter, Citizens.
