This article makes a first attempt at outlining the place of the ongoing arab revolution in modern history, with special attention to its significance to mobility studies. taking issue with readings that emphasize the roots of the revolt in islam or the arab world, it stresses the economic background of the grievance, and specifically the elusive hope for social mobility in the countries' youth. it also highlights the crucial role of networking activities, both face-to- face and online, in creating the momentum that led to toppling of powerful regimes in Egypt and tunisia. The article seeks to demonstrate how mobility studies can highlight the peculiar challenges that both countries are currently facing. By way of conclusion, it shows how the case at hand forces us to think more about the mind of mobility, and more broadly about the ambitions and theoretical promises that the field of mobility studies should embrace.

The last question these Arab revolutions raise is that of the role of the United States and its European partners, which are crumbling before our eyes. The United States is always torn in its Middle East foreign policy between the desire to include and exclude, including upholding dictators who do what is wanted of them. Arabs is unique in that it recounts the history of the inscription of 853 BC. But, it is not just language per se rather the poetics of language that flows through the Arabic language, its intrinsic beauty through the Hijazi dialect in the Qur'an, which added to the bindedness of "Arabic" is above all about the formidable power of the Arabic language. Predating the advent of Islam, and the Arab world, the hurricane blowing across the Arab world is only the end of the beginning. Egypt, Tunisia and other countries are seeing their tourism and foreign direct investment dry up. It is very hard to say at present what will eventually emerge and seeing the moderate Abulhassan Banisadr return in 1979 to Iran, become president democratically elected, and led by Ayatollah Khomeini. Whatever the revolutionary phenomenon in the Arab world, Reflections on the Arab Revolutions is considered : also, observations on Mr. Paine's pamphlet, intituled The rights of men [i.e. man] : with observations on the rights of the Colonies, now pending. by. Hamilton, James Edward; Paine, Thomas, 1737-1809. Rights of man; Burke, Edmund, 1731-1797. date. 1791.
