A Complete Guide to the Machine and Its Accessories. Completely Revised and Updated. Ernie Conover. The bed of the lathe consisted of two stout timbers. On this was mounted a set of "poppits," which carried the dead center points. A rope was attached to a tree branch above the lathe, wrapped several times around the work, and attached to a lever arm that the turner moved up and down with his foot. Cutting was only accomplished on the down stroke, the tree branch providing a mild spring to return the rope for another power stroke. He is also a lathe designer, having developed his own lathe and worked on the designs of the Nova and the Powermatic 3520b. When not writing, lecturing, or consulting he is active in providing academic oversight and teaching at Conover Workshops (www.conoverworkshops.com)--a craft school founded by the Conover family.
