A review on the Absurdity in the Plays of Samuel Beckett, Harold Pinter and Satish Alekar

1Rahid Sadeeq , 2Dr. Chaitanya Singh

1Research Scholar, Department of English, Bhagwant University, Ajmer, India.
2Assistant professor, Department of English Bhagwant University, Ajmer, India

ABSTRACT

In this paper we are bringing the concept of Absurdity in the Plays of Samuel Beckett, Harold Pinter and Satish Alekar, which includes the Beckett's earliest works are generally considered to have been strongly influenced by the work of his friend James Joyce. They are erudite and seem to display the author's learning merely for its own sake, resulting in several obscure passages. The opening phrases of the short-story collection More Pricks than Kicks (1934) affords a representative sample of this style. It was morning and Belacqua was stuck in the first of the canti in the moon. He was so bogged that he could move neither backward nor forward. Blissful Beatrice was there, Dante also, and she explained the spots on the moon to him. In this paper we review the plays and explore its knowledge. In this paper we want to show the little bit the life of these author and the role in the play.

Keywords:- Portora Royal, French Beckett's, Mahesh Elunchwar’s, Gunter Grass’s.

Introduction

Samuel Barclay Beckett (13 April 1906 – 22 December 1989) was an Irish avant-garde novelist, playwright, theatre director, poet, and literary translator who lived in Paris for most of his adult life. He wrote in both English and French Beckett's work offers a bleak, tragicomic outlook on human existence, often coupled with black comedy and gallows humor, and became increasingly minimalistic in his later career. He is considered one of the last modernist writers, and one of the key figures in what Martin Esslin called the "Theatre of the Absurd". Beckett was awarded the 1969 Nobel Prize in Literature "for his writing, which—in new forms for the novel and drama—in the destitution of modern man acquires its elevation". He was elected Saoi of Aosdána in 1984. Samuel Beckett was born in Dublin on Good Friday, 13 April 1906, to William Frank Beckett, a quantity surveyor and descendant of the Huguenots, and Maria Jones Roe, a nurse, when both were 35. They had married in 1901. Beckett had one older brother, Frank Edward Beckett (1902–1954). At the age of five, Beckett attended a local playschool in Dublin, where he started to learn music, and then moved to Earlsfort House School in Dublin city centre near Harcourt Street. The Becketts were members of the Anglican Church of Ireland. The family home, Cooldrinagh in the Dublin suburb of Foxrock, was a large house and garden complete with tennis court built in 1903 by Samuel's father, William. The house and garden, together with the surrounding countryside where he often went walking with his father, the nearby Leopardstown Racecourse, the Foxrock railway station and Harcourt Street station at the city terminus of the line, all feature in his prose and plays.

In 1919/1920, Beckett went to Portora Royal School in Enniskillen, County Fermanagh (which Oscar Wilde had also attended). He left 3 years later, in 1923. A natural athlete, Beckett excelled at cricket as a left-handed batsman and a left-arm medium-pace bowler. Later, he was to play for Dublin University and played two first-class games against Northamptonshire. As a result, he became the only Nobel literature laureate to have played first-class cricket. The works of absurdist writers most sensitively mirrors and reflects the preoccupation and anxieties, the emotions and thinking of many of their contemporaries in the western world. The Theatre of the Absurd is to a very considerable extent concerned with a critique of language, an attack above all on fossilized forms of language which have become devoid of meaning. The people talking of any matter had no intention whatever of really exchanging meaningful information on subject; they merely using language to fill the emptiness between them, to conceal the fact that they had no desire to tell each other anything at all. The Plays of the Theatre of the Absurd in general, present a disillusioned, harsh and stark picture of the world. The realism of these plays is a psychological and inner realism; they explore the human sub-conscious in depth rather than trying to describe the outward appearance of human existence. Nor is it quite correct that these play deeply pessimistic as they are nothing but an expression of utter despair. It is true that basically the Theatre of the Absurd attack the comfortable certainties of religious or political orthodoxy. The major dramatists of this tradition are Samuel Beckett, Eugene Ionesco, Arthur Adamov, Jean genet, Harold Pinter and Edward Albee. Elkunchwar reserves a special place for Yugant (Apocalypse ) which was written in 1992 and is the last part of his famous Wada trilogy, it carries all his “preoccupation and positions” as clearly as they can be. It is a play about the inner landscape of four characters and about the devastation and badlands created by malicious deeds of human beings. The picture Elkunchwar draws is grim and frightening. Apocalypse is one act play and divided into four scenes that create a sense of wilderness all around. In short presents an absurd and chaotic situation where there is no value, no order, no stability, and lawfulness has remained except the environmental as well as moral, spiritual, social, cultural, ethical deterioration. The plot of Apocalypse unfolds the various constituent parts of the story like loss/ acquisition, search/discovery, recognition/non-recognition, and degradation/ degeneration/ decay in various spheres of the lives of its four main characters: Abhay, Parag, Nandani and Chandu. As play begins, Abhay enters into the mansion “covered in dust, knocked out by the heat, panting, licking his parched lips, wiping his perspiring neck and forehead” (258). His meeting and conversation with Nandini gives us the apocalyptic images of their deserted life and land. There was nothing but the anarchy and the chaos.

Objectives of the paper

Following are the main objectives of my research work:

1. The objective of this essay is to highlight the influence of Absurdism in Indian theatre with especial reference to Mahesh Elkunchwar’s play. This essay can be divided into three sections.
2. The first section highlights the origin and development of the theatre of absurd in literary world.
Review of Work already done on the subject

Beckett travelled in Europe. He spent some time in London, where in 1931 he published Proust, his critical study of French author Marcel Proust. Two years later, following his father's death, he began two years' treatment with Tavistock Clinic psychoanalyst Dr. Wilfred Bion. Aspects of it became evident in Beckett's later works, such as Watt and Waiting for Godot. In 1932, he wrote his first novel, Dream of Fair to Middling Women, but after many rejections from publishers decided to abandon it (it was eventually published in 1992). Despite his inability to get it published, however, the novel served as a source for many of Beckett's early poems, as well as for his first full-length book, the 1933 short-story collection More Pricks Than Kicks.

Beckett published essays and reviews, including "Recent Irish Poetry" (in The Bookman, August 1934) and "Humanistic Quietism", a review of his friend Thomas MacGreevy's Poems (in The Dublin Magazine, July–September 1934). They focused on the work of MacGreevy, Brian Coffey, Denis Devlin and Blanaid Salkeld, despite their slender achievements at the time, comparing them favourably with their Celtic Revival contemporaries and invoking Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, and the French symbolists as their precursors. In describing these poets as forming "the nucleus of a living poetic in Ireland", Beckett was tracing the outlines of an Irish poetic modernist canon.

In 1935—the year that Beckett successfully published a book of his poetry, Echo's Bones and Other Precipitates—Beckett worked on his novel Murphy. In May, he wrote to MacGreevy that he had been reading about film and wished to go to Moscow to study with Sergei Eisenstein at the Gerasimov Institute of Cinematography in Moscow. In mid-1936 he wrote to Eisenstein and Vsevolod Pudovkin to offer himself as their apprentice. Nothing came of this, however, as Beckett's letter was lost owing to Eisenstein's quarantine during the smallpox outbreak, as well as his focus on a script re-write of his postponed film production. In 1936, a friend had suggested him to look up the works of Arnold Geulincx, which Beckett did and he took many notes. The philosopher's name is mentioned in Murphy and the reading apparently left a strong impression. Murphy was finished in 1936 and Beckett departed for extensive travel around Germany, during which time he filled several notebooks with lists of noteworthy artwork that he had seen and noted his distaste for the Nazi savagery that was overtaking the country. Returning to Ireland briefly in 1937, he oversaw the publication of Murphy (1938), which he translated into French the following year.

He fell out with his mother, which contributed to his decision to settle permanently in Paris. Beckett remained in Paris following the outbreak of World War II in 1939, preferring, in his own words, "France at war to Ireland at peace". His was soon a known face in and around Left Bank cafés, where he strengthened his allegiance with Joyce and forged new ones with artists Alberto Giacometti and Marcel Duchamp, with whom he regularly played chess. Sometime around December 1937, Beckett had a brief affair with Peggy Guggenheim, who nicknamed him "Oblomov" (after the character in Ivan Goncharov's novel).

In January 1938 in Paris, Beckett was stabbed in the chest and nearly killed when he refused the solicitations of a notorious pimp (who went by the name of Prudent). Joyce arranged a private room for Beckett at the hospital. The publicity surrounding the stabbing attracted the attention of Suzanne Dechevaux-Dumesnil, who previously knew Beckett slightly from his first stay in Paris. This time, however, the two would begin a lifelong companionship. At a preliminary hearing, Beckett asked his attacker for the motive behind the stabbing. Prudent replied: "Je ne sais pas, Monsieur. Je m'excuse" ["I do not know, sir. I'm sorry". Beckett eventually dropped the charges against his attacker—partially to avoid further formalities, partly because he found Prudent likeable and well-mannered.

Current Work and Conclusion

Satish Alekar is one of the renowned Marathi playwrights and theatre directors. He is one of the founding members of the Theatre Academy, Pune. For the first time, he performed in a college play. Impressed by his performance Bhalbha Kelker, one theatre personality invited him to join the Progressive Dramatic Association. He joined the group and continued theatre. Jhulta Phool was Alekar’s first one act play which he wrote and directed. Later he started writing plays. Alekar is the author of many prominent plays written in Marathi. His notable plays are Memory (1969), Bhajan (1969), Ek Julta Pool (1971), Micky and the Memsahib (1973), Mahanirvan (The Dread Departure, 1974), Mahapur (Deluge, 1975), Dar Kon Ughadat Naahi (1979), Begum Berve (1979), Bus Stop (1980), Shaniwar-Raviwar (1982), Dusara Samna (1985), Atirekee (The Terrorist, 1989), Pidhijat (Dynasty, 2003), Ek Divas 3 Mathakade (2012). Some of these are one-act plays and many are full length theatre plays which were critically acclaimed by many. Satish Alekar’s plays are staged by many theatre groups all over Maharashtra. Apart from these theatre plays he also wrote many short plays. He has also written some scripts for Marathi films like Jait re Jait (1977). He has also directed a Hindi television serial named Dekho Magar Pyaar Se for Doordarshan in 1985. He wrote dialogues for Katha Don Ganpataoonchi for NFDC during 1995-96. Alekar was also a part of many international translation projects and translated and directed short plays of authors like German playwright Gunter Grass’s The Flood in 1980, Tankred Dorst’s plays and two short plays by Egyptian playwright Dr. Alfred Farag.

Alekar is the recipient of several state and national awards for his contribution to the field of theatre and literature. He has received fellowships from the Council of Asian Culture, New York in 1983 to study theatre in the United States and from the Ford Foundation to study Theatre of South Asia in 1988. He received Nandikar Sanman Award at Kolkata in 1992. He was honored with Sangeet Natak Akademi Award in 1994 by Sangeet Natak Akademi, Delhi. He has honored with Padamshree in 2012. Literary Style of Satish Alekar: Satish Alekar is known for experimenting in theatre, usage of absurd situations in his plays and for the uses of folk forms and songs. He is considered as a modern Marathi playwright who has also tried to depict man’s alienation from society, religion, God and even from own self. Many of his plays show the tensions that exist in modern society which are due to conflict with traditional and cultural values. Generally his plays ridicule the middle class values and emphasize on the absurdity of human existence.
References

1. "Fathoms from Anywhere - A Samuel Beckett Centenary Exhibition".
12. "Gnome" from Collected Poems
14. Disjecta, 76
17. This character, she said, was so looed by apathia that he "finally did not even have the willpower to get out of bed"; quoted in Gussow (1989).
27. Knowlson (1997) p342
32. More Pricks than Kicks, 9
33. Murphy, 1
37. Endgame, 18–19
39. Three Novels, 414
41. How It Is, 22
42. Knowlson (1997) p501
43. Quoted in Knowlson (1997) p522
44. Nohow On, vii
45. Nohow On, 3
46. "Jack MacGowran - MacGowran Speaking Beckett".
47. "Big City Books - First Editions, Rare, Fanzines, Music Memorabilia - contact". Archived from the original on 24 January 2016.
51. Guardian article Plays for today 1 September 1999. Retrieved 31 March 2010
53. "Samuel Beckett Bridge opens".
54. Slater, Sasha. "Going to the Opera". Sophie Hunter Central.
55. "Samuel Beckett's old school ties". The Irish Times.

56. "Beckett Festival: Happy Days are here again". Belfast Telegraph.

Samuel Beckett's first play, _Eleutheria_, mirrors his own search for freedom, revolving around a young man's efforts to cut himself loose from his family and social obligations. His first real triumph, however, came on January 5, 1953, when _Waiting for Godot_ premiered at the Théâtre de Babylone. Alongside Beckett in the theatre genre of absurdity, is playwright Eugene Ionesco, the most introspective—and, at the same time, the most explicit—playwright of the absurd. Ionesco’s main focus is on the futility of communication, so the language of his plays often reflects this by being almost completely nonsensical. Samuel Barclay Beckett (/ˈbɛkɪt/; 13 April 1906 – 22 December 1989) was an Irish novelist, playwright, short story writer, theatre director, poet, and literary translator. A resident of Paris for most of his adult life, he wrote in both French and English. Beckett's idiosyncratic work offers a bleak tragi-comic outlook on existence and experience, often coupled with black comedy, nonsense and gallows humour. It became increasingly minimalist in his later career, involving more aesthetical and The dramatic works of Samuel Beckett (13 April 1906 – 22 December 1989) reflect the evolution of his interests in various means of artistic expression, as he composed plays for stage, radio, cinema, and television. In his stage plays, he parodies traditional dramatic action and borrows the techniques used in other modes of entertainment. Laughter is an intellectual triumph over material absurdity, and self-denial is self-affirmation. Whether it is in the nameless characters in _Play_, the lone and aging Krapp awaiting imminent death in _Krapp's Last Tape_, the pathetic Winnie sinking in her grave in _Happy Days_, the dying family in the masochistic _Endgame_, the monotonous life of waiting of Estragon and Vladimir in _Waiting for Godot_, or the down-and-outers in other dramatic works, Beckett demonstrates. Similarly, in _Play_ (1963), Beckett depicts a remote, otherworldly realm that is all dark, all still, all over, wiped out (P, 307). In the increasingly desolate world he creates, Beckett's characters struggle to maintain a meaningful existence in the face of inescapable suffering and diminishing hope. Above all else, characters like Vladimir, Estragon, Hamm and Clov wish for an ending that is never forthcoming. The absurdity of the human condition as presented by Beckett and Kermode, therefore, is that we constantly desire finitude, but are nonetheless faced with the inevitable, obligatory nature of continuation.