The second part of our title- 'philosophy, happiness and personal growth' - points to areas where the connections between education and therapy can be most readily examined in detail. We attempt this examination in two ways. In the first place, we consider a number of developments in educational practice in recent years that show the influence of ideas drawn from various kinds of therapy. Ideas inspired in particular by Carl Rogers to the effect that one should regard others with unconditional positive regard have become dominant in thinking on pastoral care in education, while Paulo Freire's work has left its legacy in notions of empowerment and ownership. The philosophy of education, however, is the study of the key philosophical ideas that have had an impact on educational theories. A distinction must be made between philosophy and educational theories. Philosophy is concerned with a set of thoughts that reflect a view of the world of which education is only part (Charlene, 2006). Educational systems and curricula are designed according to a philosophical worldview, a set of philosophical principles. The whole body of knowledge provided by the philosophy of education may justify decisions at the level of educational systems. The education of philosophy also provides both a terminology to describe teaching and learning approaches and credence to instinctive or intuitive practices. The Therapy of Education book.
